GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: We start with Israel, marking three years since the October 7 Hamas attack. Want to go to our chief international correspondent, James Longman, who is there live. Good morning, James.

[ON-SCREEN HEADLINE: Breaking at 8; Israel Marking 3 Years Since Hamas Attack]

JAMES LONGMAN: Yeah. Good morning, George. A day of mourning and remembrance in Israel at the Nova field where so many young people were killed. But three years on from the Hamas attack, there's much more anger here now. Protests began at 6:29 this morning, the minute the attack started on this day three years ago, and they are protests planned across this country today. Convoys of cars and busses are on their way here to the Nova field right now to make their voices heard. And there's anger because there have been multiple reports in recent weeks by Israeli journalists and others about the warnings Benjamin Netanyahu is alleged to have either missed or ignored. One claim that the UAE warned the prime minister a week and a half before it happened, but those warnings were not passed on. Another that the head of Egyptian intelligence came to Israel to warn about Hamas preparing something. There's also outrage about how long it took for security forces to respond. Now, Benjamin Netanyahu has called all this lies and a smear campaign. He's resisted calls for an inquiry, but the flydubai incident is also fresh in people's minds. People are worried about security here, and he is up against it ahead of elections later this month, Michael.

MICHAEL STRAHAN: All right, James, thank you.
